education: Doctorate

occupation: Professor

marital status: Married

I love teaching but I love coffee more.

Dr. Calvin Johnson starts his day early with a strong cup of coffee while reviewing lecture notes and responding to student emails. He spends most of his morning teaching classes, holding office hours, and mentoring students. Afternoons are dedicated to research, grading, and attending faculty meetings. He values structure and productivity but makes time for short coffee breaks to recharge. In the evenings, he unwinds with his family, occasionally reading academic journals or preparing for the next day's lectures. Coffee is a small but essential ritual that fuels both his teaching and research routines.

Needs

- Reliable technology for teaching (projector, LMS, stable internet)
- Institutional support for research and funding
- Administrative support to reduce workload stress
- Engaged and motivated students

Values

- Education and lifelong learning
- Intellectual curiosity and critical thinking
- Professional integrity and academic excellence
- Family time and personal well-being

Criteria For Success:

For Dr. Johnson, success means having reliable and convenient parking at University of South Carolina so he can arrive on time and start his day without unnecessary stress. A smooth parking experience, affordable faculty permits, and clear communication about availability would allow him to focus more on teaching and research rather than wasting time searching for a space.

Wants

- More time for research and personal projects
- Flexible schedule or remote work options
- Access to premium academic resources and tools
- A great campus coffee shop or high-quality coffee in his office

Fears

- Feeling constantly rushed or overwhelmed by daily pressures
- Burnout from balancing teaching, research, and family life
- Not meeting his own high expectations
- Letting down his students or not making a meaningful impact

- Bringing work stress home and affecting his personal relationships
